She lives about a mile away from the sanitarium I work at. She is an Orthodox Christian, I a Catholic. The moment I notice her I am greeted with a smile. Very friendly and helpful. She has helped me with my grocery shopping, my transportation to do errands, has been very attentive to every need.

She has a tendency to use the word 'in Christ' and not 'in God.' I think of it as the name of her relationship with God. She tends to believe her needs are more important than anyone else's, but when I have met her I have found her to be kind to everyone. She lives about a mile away from the sanitarium I work at. She has helped me with my grocery shopping, my transportation to do errands, has been very attentive to every need. She has a tendency to use the word 'in Christ' and not 'in God.' I think of it as the name of her relationship with God. She tends to believe her needs are more important than anyone else's, but when I have met her I have found her to be kind to everyone. From my very first lunch with her, I felt that she was the one that would become my best friend, and in a way it has! My friend and I are not practicing Orthodox, but we have come to know the Orthodox through her conversation and her description of her faith. Although she is a devout Orthodox Christian who is a native of Greece, she did not even know I was Orthodox until I told her. She was surprised when I told her I was Orthodox because she was under the impression that all Catholics were ignorant and had no faith. She told me she was sometimes depressed and felt like she was going crazy because she didn't have the church to turn to. However, after a while she decided that her faith was real and told me she believed in God. The faith I encountered in that woman is what attracted me to Orthodoxy. My friend and I also attend the church at the sanitarium where she lives, and we attend together when possible because my friend is very helpful and available to my needs. We pray together. She still visits the church daily with her priest and friends. She became the closest thing to my mother I have had. We have a love that has truly remained since the day that we met.
